

Do You Have The Vet Power Employers Look For?

By virtue of their military training and experiences, employers often presume veterans have the mental discipline to succeed in situations where civilians may not. This is vet power. To capitalize on this advantage, you must conduct yourself in a manner that fulfills the high expectations of interviewers. Listed below are indicators of a vet empowered mindset. Select the indicators you would like the Vet Empowerment Training (VET) to help you improve upon. Save or print your results for future reference.

- Not easily disturbed when challenges arise.
- Have the emotional strength to rise above challenges.
- Generally calm and do not sweat the small stuff.
- Do not give in to self-pity and feelings of despair.
- Do not fear rejection from others.
- Always begins a task with a positive outlook.
- Have faith in your ability to persevere through challenges.
- Can rise to the occasion and give your best.
- Do not believe you are a failure.
- Do not suffer from wild mood swings.
- How you see yourself is more important than how others see you.
- Have confidence in your sense of judgment.
- Believe you can achieve what you desire.
- Do not doubt the faith you have in yourself.
- Do not go overboard attempting to please others.
- Do not often think others are disappointed in you.
- Do not always seek approval from others in all you do.
- Believe it is human to make mistakes.
- Think realistically and optimistically.
- Sense others see you as being an important part of their happiness.
- Believe your parents are generally pleased with your progress.
- Have an easy-going attitude and takes life in stride.
- Feel content with your life and efforts.
- Do not often feel depressed or overly anxious.
- Makes friends easily and maintains long relationships.
- Believe others rely on you for emotional support, and you rely on them.
- Do not always feel the need to prove your worth to others.

VET teaches you how to reinvigorate and capitalize on your vet powers when interviewing for jobs, or when becoming an entrepreneur. Give yourself a distinct competitive by enrolling in this online course today. Thanks to our sponsors, VET is free to all veterans and their families.